The shifting balance of power between me, my students, and chaos

It's hard to teach over Zoom. In recent months, I've taught two four-week enrichment classes for middle-school students, both over Zoom. I will share how the unfamiliar technology made me feel weak and awkward, like I couldn't control the class the way I used to. Then I will explain how this power shift actually benefitted the students' agency and the classroom culture. When I get back to a real classroom, I will choose more carefully what elements I control.
