
RUDY BRECHT, University of Bremen

Deep learning for ensemble forecasting

For today's weather prediction it is necessary to generate several perturbed numerical simulations for an ensemble prediction. However, running a sufficient number of such simulations to produce an ensemble is computationally costly. Moreover, statistical post-processing is needed to further improve the ensemble quality. Thus, here we propose to learn the statistical properties of the ensemble using deep learning and demonstrate first results.