
ANDREW CAVE, McGill

Linear temporal logic proofs as reactive programs

In this talk I describe a constructive variant of linear temporal logic, and describe its interpretation as a reactive programming language via the propositions-as-types correspondence. The upshot is that the type discipline enforces causality and liveness properties of its programs. I will also discuss a variant system which realizes a version of the Gödel-Löb principle.