

---

ZHONGWEI SHEN, University of Alberta

Spreading speeds in random environments

Integrodifference equations have been widely used to model the invasion of species, the spread of diseases, etc. Traditional models assume the environment is temporally constant. A class of integrodifference equations with random coefficients is studied to understand the consequences of random fluctuations. In this talk, I will present some results about the strategy for establishing the spreading speed and the effects of random fluctuations on the spreading speed.