
LUCAS MOL, Thompson Rivers University

On connectivity of orientations of graphs

An orientation of a graph G is a directed graph obtained from G by assigning a direction to every edge. A well-known result of Nash-Williams says that every graph has a well-balanced orientation - an orientation that best preserves the overall level of connectivity in some sense. We consider some related problems, providing more questions than answers.